Stephanie Syjuco

Solo Presentation

Armory Show 2019, Booth F25

March 7-10, 2019, Preview March 6

RYAN LEE is pleased to present a solo exhibition of Stephanie Syjuco's work for its second presentation at the Armory Show. The gallery's booth will include work recently featured in the Fall 2018 season of Art21. Based on the works from a Syjuco's CITIZENS series, the works probe philosophical and historic definitions of what it means to be a "citizen" in terms of national belonging, civic engagement, and radical responsibility. Other themes explored include the ideas of insertion, negation, and standards through the use of Photoshop transparency patterns, chromakey fabrics and white balance and color cards.

RYAN LEE's presentation will consist of a new banner called I AM AN AMERICAN, a reference to Dorothea Lange's photograph of a sign posted by a Japanese American business owner following the bombing of Pearl Harbor. A related work is currently on view at the Cantor Arts Center at Stanford University. Four staged portraits present black-clad, masked "protesters," depicted by young UC Berkeley students, who are grappling with an uncertain reality and their own precarious status in the current political climate. Each of the recent graduates is queer, of color, undocumented, or a woman, rendered anonymous by being covered up. In the style of graduation or formal studio portraits, the images are part fiction, part reality, offering a chance for each sitter to inhabit a temporary fantasy of themselves as an active resister while protecting their identities. In today's political climate, masks have become crucial for protesters, preventing their identity from being discovered through facial recognition technology, crowd-sourcing, and other modern surveillance methods.

In another portrait, a checkered cloth obscures the sitter's entire body; this pattern makes tangible Photoshop's grey and white transparency background, translating a digital tool into a material experience. An undocumented individual who received her college education through the DREAM Act, her status in the United States is now potentially under threat. Under protective anonymity, the former students claim a presence where their individual identities must be absent, occupying a tenuous space between invisibility and visibility.

RYAN LEE will also be debuting three new photographic works at the Armory, including a work titled Chromakey Aftermath (Standard Bearers). In the work, two figures with heads turned away from view are draped in Chromakey fabric while holding flags. The Chromakey represents the idea of insertion, while these figures, with their identities hidden, represent what can be imposed onto them.
